Americans turning 65 today will require some form of long-term care.¹

If that number surprises you, it may be because it's hard to envision needing long-term care. Let's take a look at what long-term care (LTC) insurance can provide.

Typical LTC insurance policies are designed to pay for medical and nonmedical expenses related to the everyday care of people living with a chronic illness, disability, or other conditions over an extended period. For coverage to begin, the Insured generally must be unable to perform two of six activities of daily living.

Activities of Daily Living

- Bathing
- Eating
- Contenance
- Toileting
- Dressing
- Transferring

What care services are typically covered by LTC insurance?

- Home health care
- Hospice
- Assisted living care
- Adult day care
- Skilled nursing care

Paying for Care

As long-term care costs continue to rise, it's smart to consider the following when determining how to pay for long-term care expenses.

Medicare

Typically covers short-term medical or rehabilitative care after a medical event. It does not cover long-term care or ongoing needs.

Medicaid

Covers long-term and personal care for physically and financially qualified individuals. If your assets exceed the government limit, they may need to be depleted before coverage begins. Program options and coverage vary, which may limit your options as a patient.

Self-Insure

Relying on personal assets and income to potentially cover long-term care expenses could mean that retirement and estate plans need to change.

Family

Relying on family members for either financial help or assisting with home care can result in added physical and financial stress, as well as stress on family relationships.

Traditional LTC Insurance

Covers long-term and personal care expenses in the case of a long-term care event. If the insurance is unused, you may have paid premiums and never need the LTC benefits.
